

None of the rules currently in place that prohibit various forms of multiple ownership of media should be relaxed in the slightest. As it is, very large media conglomerates already control too much of our public airwaves, and narrow the diversity of voices to which we are collectively exposed.

The airwaves are a scarce public resource to be handled with care to protect a multiplicity of voices, not some sort of naturally occurring free market to be given away to large, rich powers.

If democracy is to endure in America, the less powerful must be protected against the more powerful so that opportunity remains equitable for all.

Don't relax any of these regulations. The big corporations don't deserve it, and they do not operate primarily for the public good but first and foremost for their own benefit.
